While the gender pay gap gets all the attention, the real news is in the number of areas where women now earn more than men. Here's a list of 10 areas where women get at least 5% more, contributed from the wider table in Warren Farrell's new book, Why Men Get More: Startup Permission Behind the Pay Gap and What Women Can Do about It. (Source: an unpublished schedule compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics) The first number is for women, the second for men. Sales Engineer - $89,908 - $62,660 Engineering Manager - $82,784 - $76,752 Aerospace Engineers - $78,416 - $70,70,7 Financial analysts 356 - $69,004 - $58,604 Radiation therapist - $59,124 - $53,300 Statistics - $49,140 - $36,296 Tools and dead maker - $46,228 - $40,144 Speech pathologist - $45,136 - $35,048 Advertising Manager - $42,068 - $40,144 Agricultural scientist - $41,704 - $39,156 Of course, many of those jobs are things like gaming service workers - (croupiers, that gets nice tips), and phone operators - categories decrease if ever there is one. But it's nice to know there are a few jobs where women prevail. I'm looking forward to the day when this list includes things like CFO, CMO, CEO. Somewhere in Queens, New York City, there is a young Latina girl who likes to take a computer apart in her spare time. He has not yet realized that this is a marketable skill, something that could easily lead to future job opportunities. That will change, thanks to an eight-week-intensive summer program dubbed Girls Who Code aimed at turning promising high school girls into engineering superstars and technology tomorrow. Reshma Saujani Picture is a typical computer programmer and programmer-described by one Quora user as involving a lot of red meat, push-ups on the one hand, while coding on the other, sunglasses at all times, tons are important, the collar appears is a must. It's important that you can squash anyone who might call you a 'geek' or 'nerd' and that you can take the girls, but also just as important that you know Star Wars movies with heart, and understand programming ideas, such as recurrence and legacy-may come to mind. It is a culture like a return that has appeared largely because of the love of female programmers. Women earn a majority of undergraduate degrees in the United States, but only 24% of women work in technical fields. Girls and boys at 12 or 13 like math and science are the same, but then something shifts. There is a cultural perception that a coder or engineer looks like a white man, said Reshma Saujani, founder of Girls Who Code and New York City Deputy Public Advocate. We want to focus on girls who don't have much access at home or school eager to technology. So she founded Girls Who Code, a summer program with support from Twitter, General Electric, Google, and eBay who wanted to help close the Science, Technology, Engineering, and Maths (STEM) gap by giving high school girls between the ages of 13 and 17 opportunities Learn more about the engineering and technology careers offered-and by giving them the confidence to pursue their goals. The New York City program, which begins this summer, will have 20 participants, representing all counties in the city and 12 different ethnicities. We want to focus on girls who don't have much access at home or school that are passionate about technology, says Saujani. Some-but not all-of-the-girls, selected from over 100 applicants, have science and technology experience. Many of them already know they want to pursue a technical career, but they don't realize they have options beyond being doctors or forensic scientists (a gentle choice of popularity on the girls Who Code applications, perhaps because of all the forensic scientists seen on shows like CSI: Criminal Scene Investigation). In fact, argue saujani, these girls can have a lot of impact by being a programmer: many women don't choose a job to make money. They choose jobs to make a difference. [They should know that] being an excavation can help boost water shortages, or help bring democracy to a country in the Middle East. Many women do not choose jobs to make money. They choose jobs to make a difference. Girls Who Code participants will have a crowded summer schedule, with activities planned Monday to Friday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Each week will have different themes (mobile apps, robotics, entrepreneurship, etc.) and upcoming speakers talking to girls every day. Already, Girls Who Code has lecturers like General Electric CMO Beth Comstock, Twitter CEO Dick Costolo, and Gilt Group founder Alexis Maybank lined up. Once or twice a week, participants will take field trips to various tech startups and established companies, including Twitter, Google, Facebook, and the General Assembly. Over the last two weeks, the girls will work on their final projects, which will ask them to solve problems using the tools they have learned during the summer. One example: Girls may be asked to identify challenges in their neighborhood, and develop something-game video, say, or mobile apps-to deal with it. Girls will receive feedback and assistance from their mentoring teachers, and at the end of the program, they will have the opportunity to showcase their ideas to a group of entrepreneurs and engineers. This is just the beginning for Girls Who Code. In 2013, Saujani planned to launch the program at seven to 10 cities in the United States this summer was about perfecting the curriculum, going to the funder and saying this is what works, he said. Girls Who Code begins with 20 to 22 participants on July 9, including a girl from Queens who likes to rip off computers. @babba.c Whether you're the kind of person who likes to splash in the waves or the kind who prefers to inhale margaritas while reading a good book, one thing's for sure: Beach Day is the best day.
